Modern multichannel recording in vivo of action potentials in the guinea pig cochlea. Cochlear extracellular action potential (AP) recordings from the guinea pig were performed using a charge-coupled device multichannel multielectrode system. Using this multichannel recording system, all the fiber types were recorded simultaneously in the spiral ligament of the cochlea. APs can be recorded from two to four single fibers along the multiple ganglion cells located in the spiral ligament. APs recorded from multiple ganglion cells were triggered by low-level current pulses applied at the organ of Corti. The electrical responses of the APs evoked by single impulses were measured and their latencies were determined. From these data, there were obtained the following results: the APs of the ganglion cells recorded in the present experiments were classified as falling into three different classes: one class corresponding to the type I/AC fibers, another corresponding to the type II fibers, and a third class corresponding to the type III fibers. These APs were characterized by their latencies, temporal wave shapes, and latencies.
