Discriminatory flow characteristics of chest radiographs in a children's hospital. The present study was undertaken to define factors contributing to the size-specific distributions of the coefficients of linear attenuation within a population of chest radiographs. Eighty-nine thousand two hundred ninety-seven chest radiographs were studied in a children's hospital over a 12-month period. Each radiograph was processed through a digital processing and display system using the same technical parameters and, to best emulate the real-world conditions, was examined with standard patient positioning. The filter cutoffs of A, B, and C, and the associated slopes, were determined by curve-fitting of linear decay lines of known attenuation coefficients through the central region of the chest film. Distributions of these parameters were generated using bootstrap resampling. These distributions were used to select filter cutoffs to best approximate those of an ideal chest film. The distribution of B and the associated slope of the thin-air cutoffs were found to be nearly normal, whereas the distributions of A and C were skewed. The distribution of B changed with age, suggesting that, at all ages, the lung is best imaged with thin-air cuts. The majority of fields were imaged with B values of less than 5.0. At a true lung thickness of zero, A could be as high as 35.5, C less than 25, and B as low as 5.8. The results suggest that most chest films are imaged with thin-air filter cutoffs that will limit detector-response-based error when lung structures are measured. The effect on patient radiation dose is negligible. Haupttrivalinansätze: Ergebnisse der Arbeit: Hauptressort: Horizontal Resource Reuse (3) (E281) Abstract: The improvement of the performance of a stainless steel electrochemical cell during storage is discussed. The main focus was to introduce the NAP-8 model which is based on IEC 60332-2-24 and IEC60332-2-29 recommended guidelines to monitor performance of the electrochemical cell during storage. Even though the NAP-8 model was first reported in 1995, it has not been widespread in industry. Its future is discussed. Impact: The
