Skeleton Key A Skeleton Key is an object or process which seems to offer an immediate, though superficial, solution to a problem, but which can be revealed to actually be a case of smoke and mirrors. The term is often used in relation to new technologies. A Skeleton Key is often used to describe the version of a technology which seems to have been carefully tailored to provide a more immediate response, often the product of market research. These have been criticized for being short-sighted in their approach, and being little more than a thinly disguised quick-fix. In the world of Information Technology, Skeleton Keys can be seen as the older, but seemingly the most successful, version of an ICT product or service, introduced to give it credibility. Skeleton Keys are often referred to as the beta version of the product/service, being the ideal short-term response to a perceived problem. The term is often used to describe: 1. Version of a new technology that is not considered to be mature or complete enough to be presented as the primary solution 2. Over-commercialized, lacklustre or badly-designed variant of the product that is not going to survive when the product matures.

The estimated wastage adds up to 12 million tonnes of food by consumers alone, said the group in a statement. To safeguard consumers against the wastage, Mara, together with other major food suppliers, has developed a self-assessment guideline called MARA FoodWaste Management Framework. The framework aims to minimise food wastage while taking into account food supply chain dynamics. The framework is applicable to all the food suppliers in Malaysia, including independent and chain outlets. In order to manage food waste more efficiently, Mara has also developed a self-assessment tool to ensure food suppliers in Malaysia keep up with the demands and requirements of the framework. In line with the FoodWaste Management Framework, this tool will be accessible via the Mara website (www.marafoodwaste.com) from Monday. The tool will be used to provide support in addressing challenges such as logistics, quality and consumer awareness, said Mara. On behalf of the association, Mara has developed a food waste assessment checklist for food suppliers to use in their operations. The checklist has been jointly developed by Mara and the Consumers Council of Malaysia (Suara). Among the checklist's sections are consumer awareness, retail and wholesale supply chain operations, packaging, labelling and advertising, warehousing, quality assurance and consumer education. The nine-point checklist, which has been validated with experts and industry associations, provides a comprehensive range of food waste avoidance and minimisation practices. "The tool will help food suppliers enhance food safety and quality, and eliminate the use of expired products. ♦ 1d6a3396d6
