For a lot of you reading this, the name "Mozilla" is probably familiar if you follow open source or the web. Mozilla, a nonprofit organization, is the maker of such major web browsers as Firefox and, until very recently, Thunderbird. Like Windows and Apple, many people just assume that Mozilla Firefox is the default browser (it's not; Internet Explorer (IE) is). And, like those other major desktop applications, the Firefox User Interface has evolved over the past few years. Firefox 9 is the latest version, currently in beta. It is very welcome and makes some big advances in Mozilla's development and organization. The first major change is the new layout for the interface. For the most part, it's a simple evolution of the scroll bars and the menu at the top, which don't do much. But they are arranged in a much more logical way. The search box remains in the window's tab menu, but the "Open new tab" option is now labeled "Always open in a new window" rather than "Open in a new tab." There are also several other changes. The Favorites bar, for example, has been given a fresher look. At the left of the menu, there is now a new check box for "Remember my browsing session," as well as a new drop-down menu for "Current tab." A right-click menu also appears at the top of the interface for dragging and resizing windows. And finally, the new task bar at the bottom of the browser window is a welcome sight. It acts as a navigation tool for searching, and it has a preview of recently opened pages. The next major change to the Firefox interface (version 4, as of today) is the addition of a search box to every tab. While this might not seem like a major advance, in reality it is. A drop-down menu lets you adjust the search behavior. For instance, if you select "Images and media," the search is only performed against the content of the current tab. Most people use the Firefox search box in the status bar (or toolbar) to search for text in documents. But it can be used to search for any web pages, including images and videos, in every tab. It also makes the speed of navigation faster, since the Firefox engine will not start indexing the entire browser window (or tab) for each search. And, as with

Genetics and diet of six species of ant-plant community in a tropical rainforest in India. We studied six species of ant-plant community in the Western Ghats of Kerala, India. A total of 40 binary habitat-choice trials were conducted with observer error, and species segregation and association were analysed. We calculated genetic distance between all pairs of species, based on 242 morphological markers. We found that (1) no species pair showed any segregation but there was almost complete association between four species of Nicotiana tabacum; (2) all species pairs were clearly associated except between the two homogeneous species, N. tabacum and N. rustica; (3) this was not associated with any of the pairwise genetic distance between species. The species that are genetically more distinct are more spatially segregated in the ant-plant community. We suggest that there was evolutionary disturbance resulting in the segregation between the species. We also found that significant differences in the degree of association between each species pair occurred, indicating that each species differs in its preference for habitats created by other species. However, we also found that in the absence of genetic distance, species were not segregated in a predictable manner. We report that the preference of the mutualistic plant species, N. rustica, for habitats created by the predatory ants, for example, Camponotus, is not as clear, probably due to incomplete colonization. The impact of unplanned admission to the ward on anxiety levels and sense of control in patients with upper extremity fractures: a prospective study. To examine the impact of unplanned admission on patient anxiety and sense of control on admission to the ward. Prospective, consecutive, 12-month study using anonymous questionnaires. Inpatient, Level 1 trauma unit. A total of 101 patients with upper extremity fractures, of whom 62 were admitted unplanned during the study period. Anxiety levels (State Trait Anxiety Inventory) and sense of control (Spilberger State-Trait Anxiety Inventory) were assessed on admission. Compared to planned admissions, unplanned admissions scored significantly lower for anxiety ( $33.4 \pm 8.6$  vs.  $38.2 \pm 6.1$ ,  $p$
