To determine H. pylori colonization levels, immunohistochemical staining was performed as described previously^[@CR39]. Rabbit polyclonal anti-BPI sera were prepared using recombinant human BPI (catalog No. H-300; Santa Cruz Biotechnology, Inc., Dallas, TX, USA) and standard techniques as described previously^{[@CR40],[@CR41]}. For the immunohistochemical staining, a section of gastric epithelial tissue from each mouse was first stained using the streptavidin-biotin method with mouse monoclonal antibody against H. pylori outer membrane protein (catalog No. 19D7; HyTest, Turku, Finland). Staining was accomplished by incubating the sections with biotinylated mouse anti-H. pylori antibody and then with StreptABComplex/HRP/D (Dako North America, Inc., Carpinteria, CA, USA) for 30 min at room temperature. Finally, the sections were incubated with 3,3'-diaminobenzidine tetrahydrochloride (Dako North America) as a chromogen for 2 min. Hematoxylin was used for counterstaining the sections. From BPI and the H. pylori monoclonal-stained sections, the colonization levels were evaluated with the scores described by Lauritsen et al.^[@CR42]. An uninfected mouse was e79caf774b

A questionnaire was used by the participating hospitals, trying to obtain general information, as well as data on the incidence of HAI. Sixty-nine acute care hospitals, at about 60% of the national total, were enrolled in the study;

For instance, it is largely unknown how a neuron's sensory response properties determine its functional output, or what physiological mechanisms are responsible for heterogeneity. At least two types of neurons have been established to date in molecular terms: Type I, which includes both asymmetrically and symmetrically connected GABAergic interneurons, and Type II, which consists of pyramidal cells that receive almost exclusively excitatory inputs and project to other pyramidal neurons, only in a few cases to GABAergic interneurons. Type I neurons appear to be GABAergic fast spiking, while Type II appears to be non-GABAergic interneurons. Mechanisms of cell-cell interactions have been increasingly characterized
