In order to study the relationship between atmospheric particulate pollution and lung cancer, we collected the atmospheric sampling data and radiologic and morphologic data from the autopsy of 1527 patients who died of lung cancer, from 1980 to 1982, and we compared them with the date of lung cancer and with the date of death of the patients. The statistical date were analyzed with the SAS software and the chi 2 test, and the atmospheric data were analyzed with the multiple regression analysis. As the results, our data suggest that high concentration of atmospheric particles and metals such as iron, nickel, copper, and zinc are associated with the occurrence of lung cancer in the areas where such concentrations are higher.Pages Monday, July 25, 2014 Currency War In a currency war, countries decrease their currency values to reduce trade deficit. This leaves their capital reserves lowered, as well as their debts. For the purpose of being able to finance their debts, country's raise interest rates to attract investors. However, investors are also concerned with currency rates. Raising rates discourages investors from buying your currency. For example, if the US raises its interest rate from 5 to 10%, investors who normally trade in US bonds will start to seek to invest in bonds of non-US countries. If they buy bonds of higher interest rate countries, it will draw foreign investors from their bonds of the lower interest rate countries. This happens because the buying power of the currency is lowered by raising its interest rate. Another example of a currency war is when a country decides to devalue its currency, because it wants to increase exports and cut imports. In this case, the country's capital reserves are increased. The country can provide more loans to its people and increase its government's spending. If it lowers interest rates as well, the more people will borrow money in the country, and more people will be able to buy the cheaper goods and services being produced. This increases economic growth in that country.
