I am writing a game in JS and I am currently writing various types of content files that are loaded into memory. The file format is written so that its size and contents are very small. However, when I use this approach, it leaves a file on the system that cannot be deleted, even if the user has no need for the file's content. Is it possible to write a file that will be deleted when the page is loaded, even if the user has no need for the content of the file? Is there an alternative approach I should take to make sure the memory footprint of the game is as small as possible? A: You can use a registry-like structure to store files that are supposed to be loaded to memory. Files will be loaded asynchronously in an unobtrusive fashion using a ReaderStream. On load, a file/directory registration is stored. Files are registered with paths and the registered reader stream can be used to
