dateLatinos vote more Republican now than before Latino support for Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump has expanded since the early primaries, according to a recent survey by the Pew Research Center. Pew's latest report on the rise of the "Trump Effect" is based on an August national survey of 3,001 adults conducted by telephone by the Pew Research Center from Aug. 7 to Aug. 28. For a comparison of Donald Trump and Hillary Clinton, Pew Hispanic Trends Project Director Dr. Julia Tate said, “I think the best way to look at it is that the ‘Trump effect’ is the segment of voters most likely to move toward Trump in the Republican primary as well as toward him in the general election.” According to the report, among registered voters in this recent survey, 26 percent said they would vote for Trump, compared with 11 percent who said they would vote for Trump in the Republican primaries in March. Twenty-two percent of Hispanic voters said they would vote for Trump in the Republican primaries, and 12 percent said they would vote for him in November. Among those who supported Texas Sen. Ted Cruz for the Republican nomination, 35 percent of Latino voters said they would vote for him in the general election, compared with 7 percent who said they would vote for him among the voters surveyed this month. With 18 percent, Texas Sen. Marco Rubio had the highest percentage of support among Latinos. What’s more, compared with the early polling for the November election, Latinos appear to be more supportive of the Republicans currently in the running for president. “Voters are gradually becoming more supportive of Trump as the primary campaign goes on
