As a rough rule of thumb, it's generally considered reasonable to split each application by an order of magnitude, with the first part typically being some sort of data integration framework, and the second likely being the J2EE application you've been thinking about all along. In the context of security, application-level security is usually better than distributed security. The main application-level mechanisms are cryptography, access control, and authorization. Cryptography is typically configured at the transport level, so it should be possible to achieve much of what you want by simply ensuring that specific types of traffic are encrypted (e.g., HTTPS only). There are three ways to control access: use ACLs, use role-based access control (RBAC), or use a Kerberos-based solution. You can generally rely on the first option, but Kerberos is both more scalable and more flexible than ACLs. The situation of the total population in the United States is similar to the situation in Kosovo. In Kosovo, already a whopping 82% of the population is composed of a minority community, while in the US, the number is approximately 1% (see: Hatrick, 1998). However, the US and Kosovo policy makers are committed to resolving the conflict in Kosovo. And it is highly possible that the US will take the Kosovo issue under consideration. Furthermore, if such a move comes about, it will provide a lesson to the British and the Germans who are both trying to deny the problem of the same minority community in Germany. It has been noticed that much of the German authorities' attempt to deny the right of self-determination to the Kosovo Albanians has been only for the sake of "making German friends". One should note that the German ruling coalition (both the Christian Democratic Union and the Social Democratic Party) have been opposed to allowing Kosovo's independence. There have been many debates about the issue in both parties, and one of the main criticisms against the SPD (which generally has been 6d1f23a050
