There is a black hole at the heart of the United Kingdom - and that black hole is a permanent one. I'm talking about the Internet, which in January reached a milestone that no nation could ever dream of having achieved. The UK now has one billion reasons why to rejoice in the Internet's vast potential - and not just economic potential. To be sure, the UK is so rich in Internet history that it's no wonder that the web has thrived there. It was in the UK that the very first ever web browser - AOL's Mosaic - first went online. Another UK firm, Microsoft, had to be dragged kicking and screaming into the World Wide Web and into the Internet age. Moreover, as a relatively young country, with a population less than the population of London, the UK boasts a greater density of Internet users than that of all other countries in the world combined. And London is the capital of the UK's Internet hub. Most web traffic is centered in the City of London, where three-quarters of all the web traffic in the UK is generated and where the Internet giants like Google and Amazon are located. Whether you are in London or not, you can always work, do business, and play from your computer - and that makes the UK an early adopter of a potential national asset that is rapidly becoming a cash cow for internet billionaires. Of course, other countries are catching up. China, the number one spam-producing country on the planet, launched a massive Internet-censoring program last year. Estonia and Iceland have found c6a93da74d
