Color Transform is now part of the Content Aware fill feature: you can drag a duplicate of a layer onto a background Color Matching Adjustment layer and have Photoshop automatically interpolate the new layers' colors. You can also create a new Color Matching Adjustment layer from the duplicate; one thing is certain, however: those new layers are treated just like any other layer mask. The new Shadow Match feature (also part of the Content Aware fill feature) combines a selection with the shadow of an object and converts it into a new selection. It's perfect for special effects such as drop shadows or highlighting, or for building a 3D model from shadows. Now when you add or remove multiple copies of layers, the total amount of memory used is displayed in a panel. In previous versions, this feature was displayed only in the Info panel. A new panel now shows the memory usage of the current document, selected layers, and the selected object layer tree. This supports the design goal of making Photoshop and the workspace simpler to use. In this beta launch of Share for Review, Adobe brings the editing capabilities of Photoshop to the iPad version of the application. You can edit photos within the app directly and even choose to save a version file or open it from iCloud as a stand-alone photo. While I agree that the new features boost performance in the LR5.2 beta, I get the impression that you don't like LR5. The interface looks like it has been tuned for LCDs. Unfortunately that tweaked LR2.x interface is gone and in its place a functionality driven interface has been put in place. I really miss the LR2.x interface. For me it feels like LR3 fairytale land.

While I am happy about the new cloud document features and the new Cropping Tools, my biggest problem is with the clone stamp. In LR5.2 the clone stamp size has been reduced and the clone tool does not select with from the clone stamp. While I know this is a feature in the pipeline, I miss the big ol' clone stamp in the middle of the canvas. While jumping into the desktop version I quickly learned that the big ol' clone stamp is back and I could easily get used to the new clone tool. I will test this feature in my use-case (copy a logo) and hopefully there will be some improvements made in LR5.2 final.

Perhaps what will prove the most exciting for the average Photoshop user is the ability to access brushes and other more-than-20 proprietary business applications and functions. They are available through the appropriate "Cloud Link." And if you cannot find the brush or function you want to use, you can use the search access point, the Adobe Creative Cloud Front End, to build your own library of brushes, patterns, and functions, so you will always have them on hand. In addition, you can search several major cloud document repositories for specific content, such as an address for a business card or other scanned image. As for Elements' editing tools and methods, you'll find the core, industry-leading selection features are much the same as they were before. The key difference this time around is that you can now edit partial objects, including paths, and lock those edits during extensive touch-ups. This release also includes Content-Aware Fill, which is a hybrid of the Smart Radius and area-based content-aware fill features found in earlier versions. Now, the software is smart enough to not only fill in the background, it also tries to blend existing content into the area to blend in the surrounding image. Other features include removal of noise and dust, along with outlining objects and recreating lost objects. By way of contrast, Photoshop's more recent editing methods include a bristling array of dedicated tools for retouching skin, or even lining up an image's subjects for the perfect portrait, as well as a number of high-end photography-oriented tools that you would probably not want to use in your every-day set of image-editing tools. Vector-art tools such as the Pen tool represent the best of both worlds, with the ability to create vectors in a pinch — and the ability to find the perfect vector tool for a specific use.
