Genetic background of high-level rifampicin resistance in Mycobacterium tuberculosis. (RIF^{high}) rifampicin resistance), is attributable to acquisition of mutations in genes encoding RpoB. To identify RpoB mutations causing RIF^{high} rifampicin resistance, a comprehensive approach is required. The design of the XERMR (X-ray Emission, RIF^{high}) detection of RpoB mutations) system consists of the following three major components: (i) a novel molecular framework to detect RpoB mutations causing RIF^{high} resistance; (ii) X-ray fluorescence to detect RpoB in both a dose-response and time-dependent manner; and (iii) a system to identify a type of mutation, i.e. a single nucleotide polymorphism (SNP) mutation or a single amino acid substitution. The XERMR system was tested in vitro on 50 clinical samples. In addition, a study of the RpoB gene in RIF^{high} rifampicin-susceptible isolates was conducted using X-ray fluorescence and data from the XERMR system. With the XERMR system, high-level RIF^{high} resistance in M. tuberculosis can be detected from within 24 hours. Moreover, the detected mutations can be discriminated into three types of mutation
