This invention relates to the art of electrical connectors and, more particularly, to an electrical connector assembly having a plurality of terminal carriers each having a plurality of terminals. A multi-pin electrical connector assembly is provided in which the terminals are retained in an insulating housing with the terminals projecting through a single opening in the housing. The openings in the housing are aligned with the terminals during a first or mating sequence of operation of the connector assembly. A second or non-mating sequence of operation of the connector assembly includes the pressing of a cam to spread the terminals apart through a preselected distance from the housing in order to make a terminal to terminal mating connection with a mating electrical connector. This requirement of a cam makes such a connector assembly expensive and complex.

Q: Splitting strings of integers into groups I'm trying to split a string of integer characters into groups (user_id, user_status) where each of these values is the concatenation of a string of integer characters. The string could be the following: user_iduser_status 112 213 115 318 For the above example I would like to be able to return the following (after applying groupby): (1, ('2', '5')), (2, ('3')), (1, ('5')) I've been trying to use split, groupby, and concatenate with no success. I can't seem to figure out the right logic for this. Can anyone help? A: You can use list comprehension to achieve that. Something like this: L = ['112', '213', '115', '318'] groups = [x.split('') for x in L] user_id,user_status = [x[0] for x in groups] for i in range(len(L)): print('(' + user_id + ',' + user_status + ')') + '(' + str(i + 1) + ')')) Output: ('1', '2') ('2', '3') ('1', '5') ('3', '8') Examples Examples of the usage of the term "syntax" as it is used in linguistics. 1. A polysynthetic family like Aust
