The beauty of Black Snake Moan is that it is completely unpredictable. It could have been terribly dumb or incredibly awesome. The thing that separates this flick from almost every other movie is that it wants to be both sardonic and somber. We know, as we watch the film, it is not going to go anywhere. And we know that just as we watch the flick. Director Richard Kelly, who came into the project in 2005, always had this concept of never ending the movie. Finally, he could do that. He never loses the sense of humor, and never loses sight of the death of his characters. And to finish the film is to make us question whether a character is alive or dead or to have us ask questions about the godforsaken world we are in. The film is a celebration of life and its riffs are brilliant. Fans of oddball films, of urban films, and folks who only take pleasure in pushing the envelope (one or the other) should have a blast here. It's not for everyone, but if you have a sense of humor, it's worth checking out. Starring Jessica Biel as a woman on the verge of giving up on love, Black Snake Moan is director Richard Kelly's first foray into the superhero genre. He has been known to take more unconventional stylistic risks, but Biel's portrayal is hardly that. Somewhat removed from the more ordinary superheroine characterizations, Ms. Biel plays an Earth-woman who is pregnant and has been dating "The Animal," played by future Lethal Weapon star and Spider-Man director Richard Donner. One night, however, she is kidnapped and taken to an alien, self-imposed prison planet, surrounded by face-hugging creatures and stalked by a hostile humanoid life-form. She comes to realize there is a much bigger picture at work.
